Two women, mother and daughter, give free rein to their thanks and express without self-censorship what women think, but rarely dare to say out loud.

Both are defiant and unjust, cynical and vulnerable, yet pleasurable, emotional and honest at all times.

Franziska, a biologist by training, stumbles into the role of housewife and mother with a seeing eye and struggles to continue her own life plan.

Mother Elisabeth belatedly realizes that her renunciation of the fulfillment of her own wishes has brought her into great dependence.

Award-winning author Gertraud Klemm calls both typical "yes ... but" women who constantly postpone important decisions in their lives because they are stuck between motherhood, equality and self-image.

Despite all the bitterness, the author's pointed language makes ABERLAND an inspiring encounter with two women who reflect on their failure in a clever way and thus deserve a lot of sympathy.
